A: More likely, a P2P network is responsible. The real question is, "how did you get the files onto your PC?". If you downloaded the cracked files via the internet from somewhere, there will be others with the same files on their computer. If you downloaded the files from someone on a LAN, someone else on your local network will likely have the same files as you. If you got them from a CD (or DVD), your CDs/DVDs are full of unwanted software that you've been sharing with others. If you really want to know how your friend got their files, look at their other files. A: The reason you can't use crack tools to download from a website is that most websites use a non-standard encryption method that most cracking tools can't handle. Cracking software (including cracking the game itself) assumes that all files are unencrypted. If you can download the game directly without using the crack tool, this means that someone on the same local network has the same files. If you got the game from CD or DVD, you'll have to ask the other person why they got it, and how they got it. @returns This message stream. * * @api / static RsMessageStream getStream(const std::string& messageId) { return RsMessageStream::getStream(messageId, true); } / * Creates a message stream from the provided message. * * @param message A RMessage. * @returns This message stream. * * @api / static RsMessageStream createStream(const RMessage& message) { return RsMessageStream::createStream(message, true); } / * 2092ce491b
